GET GONE

Long, warm days seem to help
the front door swing open more often.
We are called to go. To get gone.
To lose ourselves just a bit,
out somewhere with a little space.

The golden light of the season glows
on every mile and trail.
And finding the flow is easy.
Quick or steady, no matter.
Just as long as the steps go on and on.

Sun melts across the sky slowly, and we're grateful for the extra hours to adventure on.

Soon enough, the days will shorten.
But not today.

Today is wide open. And all yours.

TIME TO HÓZHÓ

(run in beauty)

“

We are the first people to live on this land.
We are the first people to care for this land.

Brandon Dugi

Outdoor adventure photographer and endurance athlete

Over slick red rock and snarled sage, his light footsteps choose their landing with a knowing precision. “Growing up on the reservation, we were always taught to wake up in the morning and start your day off with a run to greet the creator,” explains endurance athlete Brandon Dugi. “Some Navajos will yell real loud to let the creator know we’re awake. We’re here. And we will always be here.”

Brandon is a Navajo runner. He is Diné. Where he runs and what it means to be in harmony with a place, its history and his ancestors — that’s Hózhó. It’s more than a singular Navajo word. It’s a feeling of peace, balance and all being right in the world. Deep connection — to the moment, to the past and future — is power fuel for Brandon’s training.

“I’m now running where my ancestors rode their horses, where they trekked long miles,” Brandon continues. “This is our home.”

The biggest challenge Brandon gives himself as an endurance runner has nothing to do with pushing the limits of his strength or speed. It’s about pushing through boundaries. He wants to set an example for younger native generations, so that they see faces that look like theirs — racing, out in the world, and being acknowledged.

“That’s one of the reasons why I’m trying to push to run professionally, to not only represent the native people, but to teach the younger generation that we can do it, and that we can get out to the big world and show we are Navajo, and that we are still here.”
